Masters of Science in Nursing (MS) trained nurses are in high demand as nurse managers, clinical educators, health policy consultants, research assistants, and public health nurses. The LLUSN MS in Nursing prepares students to assume these leadership roles in a variety of organizational settings. Students who seek to further their careers, may pursue either a PhD in Nursing or a Doctor of Nursing Practice (DNP).

MS OPTIONS:

Nursing Administration (NA): The NA program at LLU School of Nursing prepares students for important leadership roles in healthcare. Nurse Administrators can run a small team of nurses or an entire health system. They also have the opportunity to manage work flow and create policies.

The curriculum draws from the practice of nursing, management, and related fields. It also includes administrative, research and clinical components. An intensive practicum provides the opportunity to develop and test skills in real-life settings with emphasis on critical thinking.

Graduates are prepared for certification by the American Association as a Nurse Executive, Advanced.

Nurse Educator (NE): The NE program at LLU School of Nursing prepares nurses for the pivotal role of educating future nurses in the classroom and practice setting. Nurse educators are critical players in providing quality educational experiences that prepare nursing students for a diverse workforce experience.

The teaching-learning strand within the curriculum focuses on developing the skills necessary for a teaching role in nursing. The NE program allows students to select a focus in which to conduct clinical research and prepare for a career in teaching. Educators can work in a variety of settings, including hospitals, nursing schools, public health agencies and more.

Graduates will be encouraged to obtain certification in their clinical area as part of the evidence of clinical expertise for the faculty role.

NE is available in the following specialties:

- Nurse Educator - Adult/Gerontology
- Nurse Educator - Obstetrics & Pediatrics
